Q+A

Your Questions Answered:

Q: I am recently married. We get along so well until the subject of money comes up and then we argue and end up hurt and angry. I don't understand my strong reactions. What can I do to resolve this?

A: Money is a major source of conflict in loving relationships. Most of our beliefs about money stem from messages and practices that occurred in our childhood. We heard things like, "No, we can't afford that", or "Buy only the best". These beliefs feel like the truth to us and they are rarely examined. When you enter a relationship, your financial beliefs are challenged and you often have a strong emotional response that can lead to conflict. Understanding your own relationship to money is necessary before you attempt to create financial harmony with another person. Once each of you is clear, negotiation becomes possible.

This celebratory survival guide reminds us that we are tougher than we thought, that we will get thru this, and we will be better for it. Amen!

Dr. Sherie Zander

We all want a great, loving relationship, yet, statistics show that very few have one.

What keeps us from it?

Dr. Sherie believes that our failure to be aware of our many male/female differences is the major cause of frustration, irritation, anger, and hurt that characterize most relationships. Believing that we share the same reality will set us up to fail. Learning about our differences will set us free to love, appreciate, respect and enjoy each other. Dr. Sherie gives relationship advice and couple counseling.

Can't Love Without It provides life changing information about the nature and needs of men and women and practical tools for relating that really do work! Finally you will be able to express the love and caring you have in a way that will be received and understood. You will discover how to create connection and maintain a partnership.

If you suffer with emotional wounds from childhood, Dr. Sherie provides individual psychotherapy sessions to move you toward healing and wholeness. Love relationship advice or couple counseling could be the solution that you have been waiting for.
